UTILIZATION OF EMDR WITH TRAUMATIC BEREAVEMENT

This workshop will focus on integrating EMDR into the treatment of grief and mourning. Traumatic bereavement is the state of having suffered the loss of a loved one when grief over the death is overpowered by the traumatic stress brought about by its circumstances. Trauma can disable the ability to cope, impair functioning, compromise the ability to adapt, and add significantly to the mourner's distress. Trauma also complicates the mourning by interfering with the processes the mourner has to go through for assimilation and accommodation of the loss.

EMDR can be integrated into treatment of traumatic bereavement to process the trauma that complicates the bereavement, and enable the mourner to complete the necessary processes involved in assimilation or accommodation of the loss. EMDR processing seems to allow the client to experience, express and discharge the pain. This is necessary for the eventual adaptive shifting resulting from the linking in of other networks with positive, adaptive information (e.g. healthy accommodation). A loss can be so distressing that access to memory networks containing positive memories of the loved one are blocked. With processing of distressing moments, experiences, and memories, these memory networks become accessible and play a vital role in accommodation of loss. Memories of the deceased serve as an essential bridge between the world with and the world without the loved one and are the building blocks of adaptive inner representations.

This presentation will discuss grief and bereavement, the processes the mourner has to go through for adaptive assimilation and accommodation of the loss (utilizing Terrie Rando's framework), factors that can complicate bereavement, treatment guidelines, and how EMDR can be integrated into an overall treatment plan.

Lecture, case presentations, and videos will be utilized.
